THE GHOST IN THE ROOM: WHY GASLIGHTING IS THE ULTIMATE INVISIBLE WOUND

Dr. Dolly Vaish, Associate Professor, Faculty of Management and Commerce Swami Vivekanad Subharti University, Meerut

We are taught from a young age how to heal a scraped knee or a broken bone. But what happens when the injury isn't on your skin, but in your mind? What happens when the person causing the pain insists that the pain doesn't even exist?

Welcome to the world of gaslighting—a psychological shadow-game where the goal is to make you doubt your own sanity.

The term itself sounds cinematic, and for good reason. It originates from the 1938 play Gas Light, where a husband subtly dims the lights in the house and then mocks his wife for noticing. Today, it describes a high-level form of emotional manipulation.

Gaslighting doesn't usually start with a grand lie. It starts with a "slow fade" of the truth. It's the manager who "forgets" they promised you a promotion, the partner who calls you "crazy" for noticing a text message, or the friend who insists you're "remembering it wrong" whenever you bring up a grievance.

Gaslighters have a specific vocabulary designed to shut down your defenses. If you hear these phrases on a loop, take note:

- "You're being way too sensitive."
- "I was only joking; you have no sense of humor."
- "Everyone else thinks you're acting strange lately."
- "That never happened. You're imagining things."

Over time, these phrases act like acid on your self-esteem. You stop trusting your eyes. You stop trusting your gut. You begin to rely on the manipulator to tell you what is "true."

One of the most dangerous places gaslighting hides is in the workplace. It's the "invisible" glass ceiling. When a colleague ignores your contributions or your senior moves the goalposts and then blames you for missing the target, it goes beyond an unhealthy work environment—it becomes a direct strain on your mental well-being. What should be a place of productivity can gradually turn into a hall of mirrors."

If you feel like you're walking on eggshells, it's time to stop and look at your feet. Breaking free from a gaslighter requires three specific tools:

THE PAPER TRAIL:

Since gaslighting thrives on "he-said, she-said," start keeping a record. Save the emails. Write down the dates of conversations. When the manipulator tries to rewrite history, you'll have the original script in your hand.

THE REALITY CHECK:

Find a "North Star"—a trusted friend, a mentor, or a therapist who isn't involved in the situation. Run the events by them. Often, a third party can see the manipulation that you've become too exhausted to notice.

THE EXIT STRATEGY:

You cannot "win" an argument with a gaslighter because they don't play by the rules of logic. Sometimes, the only way to win is to stop playing. Set hard boundaries or, if necessary, remove yourself from the environment entirely.

Your memory is not a "mistake." Your feelings are not "dramatic." And your reality is not up for debate. In a world of smoke and mirrors, the most revolutionary thing you can do is believe yourself. Clarity isn't just a comfort; it's your power.

"Don't let anyone dim your light just because they're afraid of what it might reveal."

The Lost Patch of Leafy Shade

Summers of Urban India

It's not even mid May, and it almost feels like high summer. India's hot summer is early this year!

The sun, like a giant celestial furnace burning fiercely, is baking the ground hard. Blistering heat is triggering cracks in soil as mercury shoots up. Eyes have already begun to see mirage—the shimmering pools of water on hot roads in the scorching midday heat.

People in cities have started spending most of the day inside offices, cars, or homes, hardly stepping out of their air-conditioned spaces into blazing sunshine.

This extremely hot weather literally divides the urban life into two separate parts, or rather, two different worlds that people live in. One is an inside world, the cool one, the enclosed space with walls all around, and the other, of course, is the world outside, the hot one under the open sky, where the sun beats down.

The cooler the world inside, the hotter the world outside. The former pumps even more heat into the latter as the summer getting hotter makes ACs work harder and harder.

Big cities are literally a jungle these days—a dense concrete jungle, where countless structures including houses, shops, roads, sidewalks, parking lots, tall buildings, both residential and industrial, are constructed very close together.

In high summer, this jungle that urban dwellers live in turns into a real Urban Heat Island, a heat-trapping area much warmer than the rural areas surrounding it.

With lots of activity and lots of people, more and more heat builds up in urban areas—thanks to vehicles running on fossil fuels, factories emitting greenhouse gases, and ACs working 24/7. Building materials such as cement, asphalt, brick, glass, and steel are usually very good at absorbing heat, causing higher temperatures in cities. Even nighttime temperatures in these urban heat islands remain high. Such densely constructed areas block heat from rising into cold night sky. Because heat is trapped in lower levels, summer nights in cities offer little respite from the boiling heat of the day.

Trees seem to be a waste of space in an urban landscape of skyscrapers, metro lines, and multi-lane highways. They are often ruthlessly cut down to make space for development. Isn't the development of cities just not possible with trees standing under the sun and swaying in the wind?

As cities expand, they often begin to take up significant tracts of land. Satellite images of urban areas clearly show how the green cover has shrunk and how the green spots have vanished over the years, looking like a time-lapse sequence of green turning brown, thanks to fast-growing urban sprawl.

We, the urban dwellers, are quite contradictory in our ways, aren't we ... ?

On the one hand we allow rapid development at the terrible cost of environment and fell trees for every possible reason, but on the other, we complain about cities with no green cover, heating up faster than ever and end up missing the lost patch of leafy shade.
